A concordance between US and Japanese classifications of occupations for empirical analyses of tasks in Japan

Abstract

We establish a concordance between U.S. and Japanese occupation classifications. Each occupation in U.S. O*NET is assigned to a corresponding occupation in the employment table of Japan's Input-Output Tables. With such concordance, we can use rich unique information provided by O*NET, such as importance of tasks for each occupation, to calculate various measures including task content of Japanese trade. The complete concordance table is reported.

1. Introduction

Many economists have examined tasks in discussing whether and how rising wage inequality observed in many advanced countries is related with technological progress or globalization, as surveyed by Acemoglu and Autor (2011). The seminal paper on job polarization by Autor et al. (2003) finds that inputs of non-routine analytic and interactive tasks increased in computerizing industries. We need to examine how tasks, skills, and occupations are related each other to understand the current state of labor market in globalized economies.¹

One of the most serious obstacles for empirically investigating tasks is the limitations of task data. Detailed occupation-specific task information is available in U.S. O*NET, which we will explain in detail later, but no comparable task data are available in most of the other countries, including Japan. Even if we assume that task content of each occupation is the same across all countries, there remains another problem for empirical studies on this topic: the international difference in classifications of occupations. This paper explains our concordance between U.S. and Japanese classifications of hundreds of occupations, which was originally constructed for our calculation of task content of trade in Japan (Tomiura, Wakasugi and Zhu 2014). The complete concordance table is provided for sharing with other researchers, who are interested in applying U.S. O*NET task information to Japanese occupations.

The rest of this paper is organized as follows. Section 2 describes two data sources (U.S. O*NET and Japanese Input-Output Tables) for our concordance. Section 3 explains how we establish our concordance between U.S. and Japanese occupation classifications. The complete concordance table is shown. Section 4 adds concluding remarks.

¹ Analyses of tasks, however, are no longer limited within labor economics. For example, by combining this concept with the traditional factor content calculation since Leontief Paradox, Tomiura, Wakasugi and Zhu (2014) show how task content of Japanese trade changed during the last decade. The following definition makes clear the distinction between task and skill; “a task is a unit of work activity that produces output. A skill is a worker’s endowment of their capabilities for performing various tasks”(Acemoglu and Autor 2011, p.1118).

2. Description of data sources

This section describes the data sources used for our concordance. The explanation of U.S. data is first given, followed by a corresponding description of Japanese data. As each data source has been repeatedly, though separately, used by many previous studies for various purposes, our descriptions are kept minimal.

The first data source is U.S. Occupational Information Network O*NET (<http://www.onetonline.org/>), which is the database on occupation-specific descriptors developed under the sponsorship of U.S. Department of Labor. This database is regarded as a successor of Dictionary of Occupational Titles, which was often used by earlier studies. Our concordance is based on our access at 2010 to O*NET version 15.0 Database. O*NET covers more than eight hundred occupations, and evaluates the importance of 35 skills for each occupation along the standardized scale ranging from zero to 100. As no comparably detailed task/skill data are available for Japanese occupations, we use U.S. O*NET.²

The data on Japan's industry-specific employment of workers in each occupation are available in employment tables in input-output tables published regularly with five-year interval. We use Japan's input-output tables at 2005, as the tables for 2010 has not yet become available at the time of this research.

Tomiura, Wakasugi and Zhu (2014) use the U.S. data on importance of skills for each occupation in O*NET to calculate task content of Japan's trade. To accomplish this calculation, we need a concordance between U.S. and Japanese occupation classifications as both classifications are widely different.

² Task data comparable with O*Net are available in Germany, as analyzed by Baumgarten et al. (2010). Ikenaga and Kambayahi (2010) use Career Matrix, which was compiled by the Japan Institute of Labor Policy and Training, and find increasing non-routine task inputs in the Japanese labor market. However, this Japanese data contain limited task categories and is no longer available.

3. Explanation of concordance

This section explains our concordance between U.S. occupations and Japanese occupations. In the U.S. O*NET database, 809 occupations are covered, but Japanese employment table in the input-output table disaggregates employment into 291 occupations. As a result from such differences in classifications, multiple U.S. occupations are often assigned to a Japanese occupation. For each Japanese occupation, we identify corresponding U.S. occupation(s) based on the names of occupations. As we have no detailed on-site knowledge of occupations in Japan and U.S., our concordance is strictly and exclusively based on our assessment how closely the name of each occupation appears. Although we admit that such judgment is inevitably subjective at least partly, no other straightforward way for establishing concordance between hundreds of occupations in different countries was available for us.

Sixty Japanese occupations have no counterparts in U.S. occupations and are thus dropped from the concordance. The following categories of Japanese occupations are dropped. First, shop owners (e.g. owners of restaurants) are dropped, as the U.S. classification covers only employees. Second, people employed by Japan's Self Defense Forces (Japanese Code No. 628107) are excluded, as the U.S. classification excludes military occupations. Finally, we drop some occupations, such as Japanese kimono dressmakers (1048207), as they are tightly linked with Japanese culture and almost exclusively found only in Japan.

The complete concordance table is provided as Table 1. The first column and the third column report the occupation code in U.S. and Japanese classification, respectively. Occupations are arrayed by the order of U.S. codes. We assign any U.S. occupation to one corresponding Japanese occupation, while Japanese occupations without counterparts in the U.S. classification are listed in later rows. The name of each U.S. occupation is shown in the second column. In the last column, the names of occupations in the Japanese classifications are displayed in the Japanese characters for Japanese-language readers. As multiple U.S. occupations are often assigned to a single Japanese occupation, task inputs or skill requirements of each Japanese occupation can be calculated by averaging corresponding U.S. occupations.³

4. Concluding remarks

This paper explains our concordance between occupation classifications in U.S. O*NET and Japanese Input-Output Tables. By establishing such concordance, we can calculate task inputs of each occupation in Japan based on U.S. O*NET information. Task content calculation of Japanese trade by Tomiura, Wakasugi and Zhu (2014) is the first example of applying this concordance.

While this concordance table is informative as a first-step for a wide range of various research attempts on Japanese economy, our concordance based solely on the names of occupations without any detailed on-site knowledge of occupations is obviously far from perfect. We welcome future improvements on our concordance by researchers around the world.

Acknowledgement

This research was initiated when Tomiura was a guest professor at Kyoto University Institute of Economic Research (KIER). Authors appreciate financial as well as administrative supports of KIER. At an early stage of our research, Tomoyuki Iida helped us matching occupation names as a research assistant. Financial supports by Grant-in-Aid for Scientific Research are acknowledged.
